At the most basic level, a nurse educator focuses on teaching aspiring nurses about patient care. They are often responsible for developing a curriculum and teaching using lectures or lab and clinical work. Additionally, many aspiring nurses look to their educators as mentors or advisors. A nurse educator is also responsible for planning and teaching curriculum for undergraduate or graduate-level courses, lecturing on a number of topics including community health care and pharmacology, and serve as a mentor on academic and career issues. Susan attributes her success to her mentors and family members who encouraged her in the early days of her career. When she is not teaching or assisting patients, she spends family time with her triplets and makes jewelry.
